To sum up the knowledge of hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) by providing the latest advances in early diagnosis for HCC. The related references were reviewed from Pubmed, Science Direct and Springer. The incidence of HCC has been increasing year by year because of hepatitis B virus infection, hepatitis C virus infection and other etiologies. HCC mostly occurs in patients with cirrhosis. Age and chronic hepatitis are the independent factors for HCC. Ultrasound, computed tomography and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) are the basic diagnostic methods for HCC. Liver function and AFP level are the most important to distinguish benign lesions from HCC. Especially AFP level, ultrasound and CT must be combined to diagnose early HCC. Standardized treatment has significantly improved the cure rate of HCC. Background: Recent failures to produce, or to reproduce, cloned sheep have resulted in studies of nuclear transfer, a method of cloning, where somatic cell nuclei from the donor and the recipient are placed into metaphase, zona pellucida-free oocytes of the recipient. In these studies, it has been thought that the nucleus of the somatic cell is transferred to an egg through fusion with the oocyte. Thus, the oocyte provides the capacity for transcription, translation, and energy, all of which are lost if somatic cells are used. Since the nuclear material is placed in the cytoplasm, it is possible that the ability of the transferred nucleus to reprogram the recipient phylogenetic study based on small-subunit rRNA gene. A phylogenetic study of clostridia based on the comparison of sequences of 16S rRNA gene was carried out to investigate the relationship between the Clostridium species. A comparative sequence analysis of 16S rRNA gene revealed that the 16 species of Clostridium are closely clustered, and that, of the 16 Clostridium species, Clostridium colinum was most closely related to Clostridium bifermentans in the 16 species, and Clostridium difficile was most closely related to Clostridium lentocellum in the 16 species.
