While local government in England is usually the preserve of the right, on Wednesday Labour is in third place and have lost no seats as they seek to rebuild after a disastrous result last week. They have most to lose, however, with one in ten council seats up for grabs. The Tories have meanwhile gained seats, although they are still in second place, and are just one seat short of a majority. The LibDems' share of the vote has collapsed and the SNP are in place as England's most successful party at the local level. The current breakdown of council seats won is as follows: Labour 30,935 Tories 25,965 Conservatives 23,807 LibDems 23,016 SNP 19,562 UKIP 8,497 Others 2,570 However, the results may be deceptive. These figures only include the results in the council elections which were held in May and cover around half of council seats. The last round of local elections will be held on Thursday, where local elections in the rest of the country will take place. In 2005, Cameron called the Conservatives a "natural governing party". So is it? With polls predicting a safe Conservative majority in England, the issue in England has been national security and Brexit. Elections in Scotland may have affected the UK's European Union membership and the results there could provide a surprise. Margaret Thatcher is not thought to have been a particularly hands-on leader but she did a pretty good job of it When Margaret Thatcher decided to rebuild Britain after the fall of the postwar consensus, she was criticised for failing to put out, so to speak, the red carpet for her "hands-on" style of leadership. Her critics were dismayed at her lack of charisma and her supposedly atavistic nationalism, and she was criticised for failing to demonstrate empathy with her diverse society. She was accused of being out of touch and not engaging with modern life. c6a93da74d
